As Spring Semester nears its finale, final examinations loom ever closer. For those of you who are graduating at the end of this semester, the imminent occurrence of your oral exams probably gives you the heebie-jeebies. The same can be said of those of you preparing to present your research at a conference, whether in the near or far-off future. No matter where you are in your graduate studies, there is something you ought to be practicing: the elevator speech. Elevator speeches are an efficient method of preparation for any sort of oral presentation, from job interviews to research conferences, oral examinations to original idea pitches. Elevator speeches typically last no more than 60 seconds, and the idea is to summarize eloquently your research/pitch/information for an exam question and to present that information in 60 seconds or less with no stuttering, no “ums,” and no mess-ups. By practicing this method, you will further develop your communication skills, your confidence levels will rise, and you will leave your examination committee speechless and impressed. One way to practice this method is to try making elevator speeches about random topics or objects. Try having a friend write down themes, topics, or questions on little slips of paper and putting them into a bowl. After tossing them around a bit, pick one out at random, take a few seconds to collect your thoughts and argument, and then have your friend start a timer. By practicing these elevator speeches in a laid-back environment, you won’t feel stressed and you will be even more prepared to tackle the elevator speech for your research.

A few other tips include: practicing your speech in a mirror, show your passion for your topic by using body language and movement, and practice makes perfect - especially when it comes to the “um”s and the stuttering. It’s very hard to eliminate these blips entirely on the first few tries, especially when they’ve become key characteristics in your manner of communication. By practicing giving elevator speeches on random topics, and by repeating your speech numerous times, you will begin eliminating the “ums” and other blips with ease.

Try creating an elevator speech describing your favorite Starbucks drink, with the intent of persuading your audience to order it; or, describe your ideal vacation spot with reasons you want to travel there!
Wild Swans was one of the first nonfiction historical books I read in my undergraduate studies. I was taking a freshman-level introductory course on the History of Asia, and this was one of the books assigned in the syllabus. Over 500 pages, this book was rather thick - which, I think, meant that I was one of the only students who actually read it in its entirety. I simply couldn’t stop reading this book. I remember being so emotionally and mentally affected by the story, which the author had created so vividly and poignantly.

Jung Chang spends 562 pages telling the story of her family, beginning with her grandmother (the concubine of a warlord), moving on to her mother (a young woman swept up into the Communist ideal), and her own experiences as she grew up in a China impacted heavily by Mao’s rule. Though not quite the ideal Spring Break beach read, I highly recommend you pick up this excellent text - perhaps when the semester ends and summer begins.

Chances are, you read Elie Wiesel’s Night in high school. This intense retelling of Wiesel’s Holocaust experience is one of the top-rated historical nonfiction books on GoodReads, and is internationally renowned. At only 120 pages, this book will be a much quicker read than Wild Swans, though both accounts will leave you deep in thought and intensely affected - I promise I say that in a good way! Personal accounts of historical atrocities carry so much weight, and this novel is no different; Wiesel’s novel is considered one of the most poignant and intimate retellings of the Holocaust. You simply have to read this book - it is a historical “must-read,” if you may.
